Their Thing

Offer to spend time with a family member doing something that you know means a lot to them. For example, playing chess with grandpa or learning the new video game your student loves.

Even though it might not be interesting to you, investing in other people's interests is a great way to have them feel appreciated and validated.

A Round of Applause

At dinner tonight, everyone share one thing they really appreciate about the family or a family member and then everyone claps after each one.

If clapping feels too weird, figure out a simple way to acknowledge each thing shared like a toast or snaps.
